"Does this include the history of your earlier life?" Mr. Sutherland asked.

"It's about all I can remember. If the Committee wants any further information? I shall be very glad to give them all in my power."

Commissioner Martin defined the chief duty of the Board as the administration and discipline of the police force. He thought his general clerical experience and familiarity with other city departments had fitted him for the office of Police Commissioner, and he had further qualified himself for the position by studying up the laws pertaining to the subject and the rules and regulations to of the Department.

All orders of the Board to the force were transmitted through the Superintendent, who was the absolute executive officer. No one Commissioner could give orders to the Superintendent.

Bupt. Byrnes was appointed to his office in April, 182. Commissioner Martin in excise cases were made after Byrnes's appointment than before. He knew that there had been great activity in arrests in excise cases were made after Byrnes's appointment than before. He knew that there had been great activity in arrests.

He testified that Supt. Byrnes took a vacation in the Summer of 182, and that imprector Steers was in charge of the force, but he denied that he had sent for Steers and given him any instructions in regard to the making of arrests.

"Was there not a complaint made to be you in writing by the salcon-keepers."

Commissioner Martin remembers that there was a complaint against the "say system" about that time, which was that policemen in citizens' clothes would visit salcons durin the hours when the sale of liquor was prohibited, and blackmail the salcon-keepers.

"Did not the Board pass a resolution."

"Did not the Board pass a resolution discontinuing this practice?"
"No. They simply passed a resolution declaring that they believed the system improper. The reason was that we thought it was improper and demoralizing to the force."

"Did you hear it said that policemen took money from saloon-keepers."

"I went to Headquarters expecting to find Supt. Byrnes, and when I learned he was away I sent for Inspector Steers, who was in command.
"Why didn't you wait for Byrnes to return."

"Because I didn't think it necessary."
"And Steers promulgated this order to force?"

"I suppose he did."

The witness said he had heard the rumor about sending out the unusual number of men from several citizens whom he met that day on the street. This was arly in June, 1892.

The occasion, he thought, was a proper one to call attention to the resolution. one to call attention to the resolution med the previous year against the

"I thought the captains were sending out these men. I did not know that Supt. Byrnes had anything particular to do with it. The Supterintendent was only away for the day. I understood."
